

Talisium's Education Platform – Adapting to the New Digital World

Tuesday April 9, 2019. As we enter into the new digital age, current education models are changing and learning institutions are embracing the use of modern technology to deliver borderless international education said Connect ASEAN principal Paul Tynan.

According to UNESCO, borderless education is 'all types of education study programmes or set of courses of study, or educational services...in which the learners are located in a country different from the one where the awarding institution is based' said Paul Tynan.

Commenting further, Paul Tynan said, "International students have been attracted to the Australian education system by its reputation as a provider of high quality learning; however, its affordability for overseas learners is becoming unsustainable. Australia's escalating cost of living is a further factor for concern".

"Borderless education, via online learning will address many of these issues for international students by allowing them to receive Australian education services in their own countries".

In the healthcare sector, Australian company, Talisium (<https://talisium.com>) has been a pioneer in borderless education and developed a specialised learning platform for the sector that delivers over 4000 online and 600 onsite health courses.

Borderless education in the healthcare sector (including aged care and nursing) provide a huge opportunity for Talisium to enter the Asia Pacific market which has one of the world's youngest and digitally connected populations.

Talisium's Tony Brennan said, "We are experiencing an alarming global shortage of appropriately skilled health workers and the current training model is fragmented and significantly under-delivering.

"Talisium's training platform enables health employers and professionals to access thousands of high quality courses health courses to upskill and stay current in the rapidly evolving healthcare sector".

"Talisium's world-class health-related courses developed by leading professional and academic partners provide high-quality, low-cost ongoing skills development. Successful graduates will receive certificates featuring the logos of globally recognised organisations".

The rise of the middle class throughout Asia Pacific will also increase the demand of health services and this demand will only be satisfied by borderless education of the local workforce.

The global market for ongoing professional development will continue to grow and the increased mobility of workforces will see online education platforms well positioned to provide accessibility and deliver ongoing training.

Talisium is recognised as a world class education health platform and being located in Australia gives it a unique package to be the borderless education provider of choice in international marketplaces.
